Despite a fragile economy during the first half of the eighteenth century, five ropewalks are now operating in the Fort Hill area by 1743 as the William Price map of that year shows. This number would rise to seven by 1790. A recession after the end of the French and Indian War and the imposition of the Stamp Act marked the beginning of extreme tension between the colony and the British government.